Vasu, 2. Satya, 3. Kratu, 4. Daksha, 5. Kāla, 6. Kāma, 7. Dhṛiti, 8. Kuru, 9. Purū-ravas, 10. Mādravas; two others are added by some authorities, viz. 11. Roćaka or Loćana, 12. (according to some authorities for viśva + amitra, and meaning 'no friend to all;' but more probably for viśva-mītra, 'the friend of all,' the final of viśva being lengthened), N. of a celebrated Kshatriya, described as son of Gāthin or Gādhi, deriving his lineage from an ancestor of Kuśika, named Purū-ravas, of the lunar race of kings, and himself sovereign of Kanyā-kubja or Kanoj, (according to one account he was brother of Satya-vatī, wife of Ṛićīka and mother by him of Jamad-agni, q. v., who was the father of Paraśu-rāma; he had one hundred sons, fifty of whom offended their father, and being degraded by him to the condition of outcasts, became the progenitors of various barbarous tribes and Dasyus: the fame of Viśvā-mitra rests chiefly on his contests with the great Brāhman Vasishṭha, and his success in elevating himself, though a Kshatriya, to the rank of a Brāhman, see Manu VII. 42: the Rāmāyaṇa, which makes him a companion and counsellor of the young Rāma-ćandra, records [I. 51–65] how Viśvā-mitra, on his accession to the throne, visited the hermitage of Vasishṭha, and seeing there the cow of plenty [probably typical of go, 'the earth'], offered the Muni untold treasures in exchange for it, but being refused, prepared to take it by force; a long contest ensued between the king and the saint [symbolical of the struggles between the Kshatriya and Brāhmanical classes], which ended in the defeat of Viśvā-mītra, whose vexation was such that, in order to become a Brāhman and thus conquer his rival, he devoted himself to intense austerities, gradually increasing the rigour of his mortification through thousands of years, till he successively earned the titles of Rājarshi, Ṛishi, Maharshi, and finally Brahmarshi; during the course of these penances Indra and the gods jealous of his increasing power—as exhibited in his transporting king Tri-śaṅku to the skies, and in saving his nephew Sunaḥ-śepha, son of his own brother-in-law Ṛićīka, out of the hands of Indra, to whom he had been promised by king Ambarīsha as a victim in a sacrifice—sent first the nymph Menakā and subsequently Rambhā to seduce him from his passionless life, and his surrender to the allurements of the first of these nymphs led to the birth of a daughter called Śakuntalā, q. v., the heroine of the celebrated drama; the rivalry between Viśvā-mitra and Vasishṭha is alluded to in many passages of the Ṛig-veda; it is thought, therefore, that as caste distinctions had not then become fixed, the later myths on the subject of this rivalry may have rested on a Vedic legend, according to which king Su-dās, having employed Vasishṭha as his domestic priest, allowed on various occasions Viśvā-mitra also to officiate, which of course led to jealousies and quarrels between these two functionaries: the whole of the hymns of the third Maṇḍala of the Ṛig-veda and a few others are attributed to Viśvā-mitra, or to members of his family); Viśvāmitrasyāyaṇdhu, N. of a Sāman; (ās), m. pl. the family or descendants of Viśvā-mitra; (ā), f., N. of a river. — Viśvāmitra-priya, as, m. III. 39. said to be fr. rt. 2. vish, 'to pervade;' according to some fr. rt. 1. viś), all-pervading, encompassing, pervading, penetrating (Ved); (us), m., N. of one of the principal Hindū deities, (in the later mythology regarded as 'the preserver,' and with Brahmā 'the creator' and Śiva 'the destroyer,' constituting the well-known Tri-mūrti or triad; although Vishṇu comes second in the triad he is identified with the supreme deity by his worshippers; in the Vedic period, however, he is not placed in the foremost rank, and though frequently invoked with Indra, Varuṇa, the Maruts, Rudra, Vāyu, and the Ādityas, his superiority to these is never stated, and he is even described in one place as celebrating the praises of Indra and deriving his power from that god [cf. his later name Indrānuja, 'younger brother of Indra'], the point which distinguishes him from the other Vedic deities being chiefly his striding over the heavens, which he is said to do in three paces [see tri-vikrama], explained as denoting the threefold manifestations of light in the form of fire, lightning, and the sun, or as designating the three daily stations of the sun in his rising, culminating, and setting; the later legend of the Vāmana Ava-tāra grew out of this Vedic conception [see bali]; he does not appear to have been included at first among the Ādityas or sons of Aditi, whose number in the Vedic period varies from six to eight, though in later times, when their number was raised to twelve, representing the sun in the twelve months of the year, Vishṇu is accorded the foremost place among them; in the Brāhmaṇas he is identified with sacrifice, and in one described as a dwarf; in the Mahā-bhārata and Rāmāyaṇa he is not connected with the sun, but gradually rises to the supremacy which he now enjoys as the most popular deity of modern Hindū worship, and although in some passages of the former he is represented as paying homage to Śiva [cf. his name Śiva-kīrtana], the great rivalry between these gods and their worshippers—who are respectively called Vaishṇavas and Śaivas, and who each exalt their favourite to the first place in the Hindū Pantheon—is not fully developed till the period of the Purāṇas: the distinguishing feature in the character of the Post-vedic Vishṇu is his condescending to become incarnate in a portion of his essence on ten principal occasions, to set right particular disturbances or deliver mankind from certain great dangers; his ten principal incarnations or Avatāras are, 1. the Matsya or 'fish;' 2. the Kūrma or 'tortoise;' 3. the Varāha or 'boar;' 4. the Nara-sigha or 'man-lion;' 5. the Vāmana or 'dwarf' [see bali]; 6. Kṛishṇa or 'the dark One,' who is held by the Vaishṇavas to be not so much an incarnation of Vishṇu as the very essence of Vishṇu or rather Vishṇu himself, so that the Bala-rāma incarnation, which is sometimes mixed up with this eighth Ava-tāra, is also occasionally substituted for it; 9. Buddha or 'the enlightened One,' by adopting whom the Brāhmans appear to have desired to effect a compromise between their own creed and Buddhism; 10. Kalki, which is yet to come; see these various incarnations s. v.; some of the Purāṇas multiply these Ava-tāras to the number of twenty-two or even twenty-four; as the supreme being Vishṇu is often identified with Nārāyaṇa, the personified Purusha or primeval living spirit [described as moving on the waters, reclining on Śesha, the serpent of infinity, while the god Brahmā emerges from a lotus growing from his navel; cf. Manu I. 10]; the wife of Vishṇu is Lakshmī or Śrī, and his paradise is called Vaikuṇṭha; he is usually represented with a peculiar mark on his breast called Śrī-vatsa, and as holding a śaṅkha or conch-shell called Pāñcajanya, a cakra or quoit-like missile-weapon called Su-darśana, a gadā or club called Kaumodakī, and a padma or lotus; he has also a bow called Śārṅga, and a sword called Nandaka; his vāhana or vehicle is Garuḍa, q. v.; he has a jewel on his wrist called Syamantaka, another on his breast called Kaustubha, and the river Ganges is said to issue from his foot; the demons slain by him in his character of 'preserver from evil,' or by Kṛishṇa as identified with him, are Madhu, Dhenuka, Cāṇūra, Yamala, and Arjuna [see yamalārjuna], Kālanemi, Hayagrīva, Śakaṭa, Arishṭa, Kaiṭabha, Kaṃsa, Keśin, Mura, Śālva, Mainda, Dvi-vida, Rāhu, Hiraṇya-kaśipu, Vāṇa, Kāliya, Naraka, Bali; he is worshipped under a thousand names, which are all enumerated in the Anuśāsana-parvan of the Mahā-bhārata, ll. 6950–7056; for his epithet, 'younger brother of Indra,' see bali; he is sometimes regarded as the divinity of the lunar mansion called Śravaṇa; Vishṇu Prājāpatya is said to be the author of Ṛig-veda X. 184); N. of Agni or fire; of one of the Vasus; of an ancient law-giver or writer of a law-book; a pure or pious person (= śuddha). — Vishṇu-ṛiksha, am, n. वेद veda, as, m. (fr. rt. 1. vid; cf. Gr. οἶδα fr. ιδ, Lat. video fr. vid, Goth. vait, Lith. weizd), knowing, knowledge; 'the true knowledge, divine knowledge,' N. of certain celebrated works which constitute the basis of the first period of the Hindū religion, (these works were originally three, viz. 1. the Ṛig-veda, 2. the Yajur-veda [of which there are, however, two divisions, see taittirīya-saṃhitā, vājasaneyi-saṃhitā], 3. the Sāma-veda; these three works are sometimes called collectively trayī, 'the triple Vidyā' or 'threefold knowledge,' but the Ṛig-veda is really the only original work of the three, and much the most ancient, some of its hymns being rather Indo-European than Hindū, and representing the condition of the Āryans before their final settlement in India; subsequently a fourth Veda was added, called the Atharva-veda, which was probably not completely accepted till after Manu, as his law-book often speaks of the three Vedas—calling them trayam brahma sanātanam, 'the triple eternal Veda,' and stating in I. 23. that the Creator drew forth the Ṛig-veda from fire, the Yajur-veda from air, and the Sāma-veda from the sun; and in another place, IV. 124, stating that the Ṛig has the gods for its deities, the Yajur has men, and the Sāma has the Pitṛis, on which account the sound of this latter is impure—but only once [XI. 33] mentions the revelation made to Atharvan and Aṅgiras, without, however, calling it by the later name of Atharva-veda, the songs and incantations of the Atharvans not being at that time recognised as a fourth Veda; each of the four Vedas has two distinct parts, viz. 1. a Saṃhitā or collection of Mantras, i. e. of words of prayer and adoration often addressed either to fire or to some form of the sun or to some form of the air, sky, wind, &c., and praying for health, wealth, long life, cattle, offspring, victory, and even forgiveness of sins, which words of prayer or praise form what is usually called the Mantra portion of the Veda [see mantra], and 2. a Brāhmaṇa portion consisting of Vidhi and Artha-vāda, i. e. directions for the detail of the ceremonies at which the Mantras were to be used and explanations of the legends &c. connected with the Mantras [see brāhmaṇa, vidhi], both these portions being termed Śruti, revelation orally communicated by the Deity, and heard but not composed or written down by men; although both portions are supposed by orthodox Hindūs to have existed from eternity, and not to require pramāṇa, 'proof,' as they are themselves Pramāṇa, yet the oldest of the Mantras are not likely to belong to a much earlier date than the twelfth or thirteenth century B. C.; and it is certain that both Mantras and Brāhmaṇas were compositions spread over a considerable period, much of the latter being comparatively modern: as the Vedas are properly three, so the Mantras are properly of three forms, 1. Ṛić, which are verses of praise in metre, and intended for loud recitation; 2. Yajus, which are in prose, and intended for use at sacrifices; 3. Sāman, which are in metre, and intended for chanting at the Soma or Moon-plant ceremonies, the Mantras of the Atharva-veda having no special name; but it must be borne in mind that the Yajur and Sāma-veda hymns, especially the latter, besides their own Mantras, borrow largely from the Ṛig-veda; the Yajur-veda and Sāma-veda being in fact not so much collections of prayers and hymns as special prayer and hymn-books intended as liturgical or sacrificial manuals for the Adhvaryu and Udgātṛi priests respectively, the necessity for which grew out of the vast and complicated ritual elaborated by the Āryans after they had settled down in India [see yajur-veda, sāma-veda]; the more modern Atharva-veda-saṃhitā, on the other hand, is, like the Ṛig-veda, a real collection of original hymns mixed up with incantations, borrowing little from the Ṛig, having no direct relation to mere ritual or sacrifices, but supposed by mere recitation to produce long life, to cure diseases [generally in connection with the use of some plant or drug gifted with magical properties], to obtain success in love or gaming, to effect the ruin of enemies, and to secure the reciter's own prosperity; each of the four Vedas seems to have passed through numerous Śākhās or schools, giving rise to various recensions of the text, though the Ṛig-veda is only preserved in the Śākala recension; as to arrangement, the Mantras being made up in the first instance of separate Padas or words are joined together so as to form Sūktas or hymns; the hymns of the Yajur-veda, with the exception of its last book, which is thought to be mystical, are arranged according to the sacrifices at which its Mantras were used, and those of the Sāma-veda with reference especially to the Moon-plant sacrifices, but those of the Ṛig-veda Mantras having no direct reference to sacrificial acts are arranged either according to their authors and the objects addressed or according to mere bulk; the former is the distribution into ten Maṇḍalas, the first and last three Maṇḍalas including a variety of authors or rather Ṛishis [who are said to have seen the Vedas and not composed them], and each of the other Maṇḍalas belonging to one particular Ṛishi; the latter is the distribution into Aṣṭakas [see maṇḍala, varga]: a tradition makes Vyāsa the compiler and arranger of the Vedas in their present form: they each have an Anukramaṇī or Index, giving the first word of every hymn, the number of verses, the name of the devatā or deified being about which the Mantra is concerned [sometimes, however, the devatā may be an inanimate object], the names and families of the authors and the metre, the principal work of this kind being the Sarvānukramaṇī or general Index; out of the Brāhmaṇa portion of the Veda grew two other departments of Vedic literature, sometimes included under the general name Veda, viz. the strings of aphoristic rules, called Sūtras [though these are often said to be pauruṣheya, i. e. human compositions], and the mystical treatises on the nature of God and the relation of soul and matter, called Upanishads, which were appended to the Āraṇyakas, certain chapters of the Brāhmaṇas so obscure and awe-inspiring in their allusions to the Supreme Spirit of the Universe that they had to be read in the solitude of forests; the most important of the former are the Kalpa-sūtras or Śrauta-sūtras as founded directly on Śruti; these strings of rules being in fact guides to the rambling discursive Brāhmaṇas and systematized directories for the due performance of every part of the ceremonial, while the Upanishads, on the other hand, taught the secret doctrine [called rahasya in Manu II. 165. and vedānta in VI. 83, 94] underlying the ceremonial, viz. the existence of one Universal Spirit, called Brahma, with which the whole creation and the human soul itself was identified; as the Śrauta-sūtras were followed by the Gṛihya and Sāmayāćārika Sūtras or 'rules for domestic ceremonies and conventional customs,' which again became the forerunners of the Dharma-śāstras and thus linked the Veda with the code of Manu, so the Āraṇyakas were followed by the Upanishads, which latter became the real Veda of thinking Hindūs, leading to the Darśanas or systems of philosophy, and linking them also with Vedic literature: in modern writings the name of 'fifth Veda' is accorded to the Itihāsas or legendary epic poems and the Purāṇas, and certain Upa-vedas or secondary Vedas are enumerated, that of the Ṛig-veda being the Āyur-veda or Veda on medicine, that of the Yajur being the Dhanur-veda or Veda on archery, that of the Sāma being the Gāndharva-veda or Veda on music, and that of the Atharva-veda being either the Sthāpatya-veda or Artha-śāstra or Śilpa-śāstra, q.q.v.v.; the Vedāṅgas or works serving as limbs [for preserving the integrity] of the Veda, of which the Kalpa-sūtras form a part, are explained under vedāṅga, col. 3: the only other works included under the head of Veda being the Pariśishṭas, which supply rules for the ritual omitted in other works; in the Bṛihad-āraṇyaka Upanishad the Vedas and all the above literature are represented as the breathings of Brahmā, while in some of the Purāṇas the four Vedas are said to have been created by the four-faced Brahmā from his several mouths, and in the Vishṇu-Purāṇa the Veda and Vishṇu are identified); addressed in the Mantras; after which come twelve chapters of explanation with an introduction, to which is also added a Pariśishṭa of two other chapters, [see yāska]: 5. Jyotisha, 'astronomy,' or rather the Vedic calendar, represented by a small tract in a more modern style than the Sūtra works, the object of which is to fix the most auspicious days for sacrifices: 6. Kalpa, 'ceremonial,' represented by a large number of Sūtra works intended to systematize the tedious and confused ritualistic precepts of the Brāhmaṇas; each of the Vedas has its own Kalpa or Śrauta Sūtras, [see sūtra and cf. veda, p. 963]: the first and second of these Vedāṅgas is said to be intended to secure the correct reading or recitation of the Veda, the third and fourth the understanding of it, and the fifth and sixth its proper employment at sacrifices: the Vedāṅgas are alluded to by Manu, who calls them, in III. 184, Pravaćanas, 'expositions,' a term which is said to be also applied to the Brāhmaṇas.) — Vedāṅgin, ī, m. one who studies or teaches the Vedāṅgas. — Vedādi (°da-ādi), n. or vedādi-varṇa (°da-ād°), as, m. or vedādi-vīja (°da-ād°), am, n. the first syllable of the Veda or the mystical name of God, the sacred syllable Om. — Vedādhigama (°da-adh°), as, m. the going over or study of the Vedas. — Vedādhipa (°da-adh°), as, or vedādhipati (°da-adh°), is, m. 'end of the Veda,' N. of the second and most important part of the Mīmāṇsā or third of the three great divisions of Hindū philosophy (so called either as teaching the ultimate aim and scope of the Veda or simply as founded on the Upanishads which come at the end of the Veda; this system, although belonging to the Mīmāṇsā school [see mīmāṇsā] and sometimes called Uttara-mīmāṇsā, 'examination of the later portion or jñāna-kāṇḍa of the Veda,' i. e. of that portion contained in the Āraṇyakas and Upanishads [which teach the knowledge of Brahma or the Universal Spirit], stands out prominently by itself as representing the popular pantheistic creed of the Hindūs of the present day, which is really based on the Upanishads and constitutes the true Veda of the modern cultivated Brāhman, underlying also all the polytheism and multiform mythology of the people; it explains the universe synthetically as a development from one principle, and so differs from the analytical Nyāya which treats of the various objects constituting the material world as it finds them, without investigating their mutual relation of effect and cause, and from the Sāṅkhya which, although also synthetic, propounds a duality of principles to account for the visible universe; according to the Vedānta doctrine, Brahma [nom. neut. of brahman] or the Supreme Soul, also called Paramātman, is both the efficient and material cause of the world; the Ātman or individual human soul, as well as all the phenomena of nature, being really identical with the Paramātman, and their existence being only the result of Ajñāna or an assumed ignorance on the part of this Supreme Soul, who is described as both Creator and Creation, Actor and Act, Existence, Knowledge, Joy, and as devoid of the three qualities, [see guṇa]; the liberation of the human soul, its deliverance from transmigrations, and re-union with the Paramātman, with which it is really identified, is only to be effected by a removal of that ignorance which prevents the consciousness of this identity and by a proper understanding of the truth of the Vedānta; this system is also sometimes called Brahma-mīmāṇsā and Śārīraka-mīmāṇsā, 'investigation of the embodied soul:' the founder of the school is said to have been Vyāsa, also called Bādarāyaṇa, and its most eminent teacher was Saṅkarāćārya); (ās), m. pl. the Upanishads (see Kullūka on Manu VI. 83), works on the Vedānta philosophy. — Vedānta-kalpataru, us, m., N. of a work by Amalānanda Vyāsāśrama. — Vedānta-kalpalatikā, f., N. of a work by Madhu-sūdana-sarasvatī. — Vedānta-ga or vedānta-jña, as, m. a follower or knower of the Vedānta. — Vedānta-pradīpa, as, m., N. of a commentary by Rāmānuja on the Bādarāyaṇa-sūtra. — Vedānta-bhāshya, am, n., N. of a work by Vyāsa-tīrtha. — Vedānta-sāra, as, m. I. 153. fr. rt. 1. śi; more probably to be connected with rt. śvi and śavas, see śiśvi), auspicious, propitious, prosperous, happy, fortunate, lucky, increasing, thriving, right; (as), m., N. of the third god of the Hindū Tri-mūrti, (in the later mythology regarded as 'the destroyer,' and with Brahmā, 'the creator,' and Vishṇu, 'the preserver,' constituting the well known Hindū triad of divine manifestations; although the name Śiva is not found applied to any god in the Veda, the worship of the destroying and reproducing principle under this name was rapidly developed in the Purāṇas and epic poems, and became very general in later times, the worshippers of Śiva or Śaivas assigning to him the first place in the triad and by identifying him with the principles of creation and reproduction as well as that of destruction, constituting him the one Supreme Being who is supposed to comprehend all the powers and forces of nature and whose formidable character makes him the first object of propitiation and adoration; in the Śiva-Purāṇa he is addressed as Brahmā, Vishṇu, Indra, Varuṇa, the Sun, Moon, Earth, Fire, Water, Air, Ether, &c., while even in the Vishṇu and other Purāṇas not specially devoted to his praise, he is mentioned with the greatest reverence and awe; according to one view the name Śiva belonged originally to the principal god of the aboriginal tribes of India, and being subsequently adopted together with the Liṅga or symbol of reproduction into the Pantheon of the Āryans, was then identified with their own deity Rudra, who occupies a conspicuous position in the Veda as god of storms; but according to a more likely supposition the adjective śiva, 'auspicious,' being at first only used as an euphemistic epithet to propitiate the lord of tempests, passed afterwards into his name, and was ultimately adopted as the principal name of the god of destruction, [see rudra]; according to Vishṇu-Purāṇa I. 8. there are eight principal manifestations of Śiva, viz. Rudra, Bhava, Sarva, Iśāna, Paśu-pati, Bhīma, Ugra, Mahā-deva, which again are visibly represented under eight Tanus or material forms, viz. the Sun, Water, Earth, Air, Fire, Ether, the officiating Brahman, and the Moon, Śiva being supposed to uphold the universe by means of these forms; as presiding over reproduction, which follows destruction, his symbol is the Liṅga or Phallus, under which form he is generally worshipped at the present day; as god of justice or punishment, which character he shares with the gods Yama and Varuṇa, he is represented as riding on a white bull, the god Dharma, it is said, having taken this form and requested Śiva to accept him as his vehicle; his own colour is sometimes depicted as black in his character of destroyer of the world, when he is called Kāla or Time; again, one of his representations is as Ardha-nārī, 'half-female,' the other half being male to symbolize the unity of the generative principle, his name being then Ardha-nārīśa, 'the half-female lord;' he has sometimes five faces, whence his name Pāñcānana; he has also three eyes, one of which is in his forehead, and which are thought to denote his view of the three divisions of time, past, present, and future, while a moon's crescent, round or above the central eye, marks the measure of time by months, a serpent round his neck the measure of time by years, and a second necklace of skulls with numerous other serpents about his person, the perpetual revolution of ages, and the successive extinction and generation of the races of mankind: his hair is thickly matted together, and gathered above his forehead into a coil, so as to project like a horn; on the top of it he bears the Ganges, the rush of which river in its descent from heaven he intercepted by his head that the earth might not be crushed by the weight of the falling stream; his throat is dark-blue from the stain of the deadly poison which would have destroyed the world had it not been swallowed by him on its production at the churning of the ocean by the gods for the nectar of immortality: he is sometimes represented clothed in a deer-skin, sometimes in a tiger-skin, or he appears sitting on a tiger-skin or holding a deer in one of his hands; in explanation of this a legend is told that Śiva, having once visited a forest in the form of a religious mendicant, the wives of the Ṛishis residing there fell in love with his great beauty, which the Ṛishis perceiving resented; in order, therefore, to overpower him, they first dug a pit, and by magical arts caused a tiger to rush out of it, which he slew, and taking its skin wore it as a garment; they next caused a deer to spring out upon him, which he took up in his left hand and ever afterwards retained there; they then produced a red-hot iron, but this too he took up and kept in his hand as a weapon: sometimes, again, he appears wearing an elephant's skin which belonged to an Asura named Gaya, who acquired such power that he conquered the gods and would have destroyed the Munis had they not fled to Benares and taken refuge in a temple of Śiva, who then destroyed the Asura and, ripping up his body, stripped off the hide which he afterwards cast over his shoulders for a cloak: Śiva holds a triśūla or three-pronged trident [also called Pināka] in his hand to denote, as some think, his combination of the three attributes of Creator, Destroyer, and Regenerator; his other weapons are a bow called Ajakava or Ajagava, a thunderbolt, an axe, a kind of staff with transverse pieces surmounted by a skull called Khaṭvāṅga, and another nondescript weapon called Khiṅkira; he also carries a kind of rattle or drum, shaped like an hour-glass, called Damaru, and a Pāśa or noose for binding incorrigible offenders: his attendants or servants are called Pramatha; they are sometimes regarded as demons or supernatural beings of various kinds, and form a complete host; some of his more personal attendants or chamberlains have special names, such as Nandi or Nandin, Bhṛiṅgin, Taṇḍu, the latter being the original teacher of dancing &c., whence Śiva is called Naṭeśvara, 'the lord of dancers,' and is himself described as nāṭya-priya, fond of dancing: his principal wife Durgā, otherwise called Pārvatī, Umā, Gaurī, Bhavānī, Satī, &c., is the chief object of worship with the Śāktas and Tāntrikas, see śakti, śākta, tantra: his sons are Gaṇeśa and Kārttikeya: he destroyed several Asuras or demons, such as Pura, Tripura, Andhaka, Ruru; he also scorched the god of love, Kāma-deva, to ashes by a glance from his central eye, that deity having attempted to inflame him with passion for Pārvatī whilst he was engaged in severe penance; he is said to have cut off one of the heads of the god Brahmā, that god having originally possessed five heads, one of which is fabled to have addressed Śiva on a particular occasion in a disrespectful manner, cf. brahma-mūrdha-bhṛit; he also decapitated Daksha and replaced his head by that of a ram, because that sage, who was his father-in-law, omitted to invite him and his wife Satī to a great sacrifice at which all the other gods were present, see dakshādhvara-dhraṇśa-kṛit; in the exercise of his function of Universal Destroyer he destroys, at the end of every Kalpa, not only all created beings, but even Brahmā, Vishṇu, and the other gods, whose bones and skulls he wears as garlands; moreover, at the end of one of the early Kalpas he is fabled to have burnt them up by a flash from his central eye, and afterwards to have rubbed their ashes upon his body, whence the use of ashes is considered of great importance in his worship, while the use of the Rudrāksha berries or beads originated, it is said, from the legend that Śiva, on his way to destroy the three cities, called Tri-pura, let fall some tears of rage which became converted into these beads: his residence is Kailāsa, one of the loftiest northern peaks of the Himālaya, which is also the paradise of Kuvera: he has strictly no incarnations like those of Vishṇu, though Vīra-bhadra and the eight Bhairavas are sometimes regarded as forms of him, sometimes as his sons, see vīra-bhadra, bhairava; he is especially worshipped at Benares and has even more names than Vishṇu, one thousand and eight being specified in the sixty-ninth chapter of the Śiva-Purāṇa and in the seventeenth chapter of the Anuśāsana-parvan of the Mahā-bhārata, some of the most common being Mahā-deva, Śambhu, Śaṅkara, Īśa, Īśvara, Maheśvara, Hara, Rudra); the phallic emblem of Śiva, the male genital organ, penis; a god (=deva, according to Śabda-k.); an auspicious planetary conjunction; the twentieth of the astronomical periods called Yogas, (see yoga); epithet of a particular month; the Veda; final emancipation (=mokṣha); a pillar or post to which cattle are tied; a kind of drug and perfume (=bāluka or vāluka); a particular plant or drug (=puṇḍarīka); the black Dhustūra or thorn-apple; bdellium; quicksilver; N. of a scribe; (au), m. du. Su-prabhā, Kāñcanākshī, Viśālā, Manoramā, Ogha-vatī, Su-reṇu, and Vimalodakā; in the Śānti-parvan 12920, Sarasvatī is called the mother of the Vedas, which is also elsewhere said of Vāć, though Vāć in the earlier mythology is regarded as a separate deity; according to later legends the goddess Sarasvatī was persuaded to descend from heaven and confer her invention of language and letters on the human race by the sage Bharata, whence one of her names is Bhāratī; she is sometimes represented as assuming the form of a Haṃsa or swan, and is also called Mahā-śvetā or Mahā-śuklā from her extreme whiteness); N. of a celebrated river (held very sacred by the Hindūs and in the earlier mythology mixed up with the goddess [see above]; it corresponds with the modern Sursooty, which rises in the mountains bounding the north-east part of the province of Delhi, and running in a south-westerly direction becomes lost in the sands of the great desert; this river formerly marked one of the boundaries of the region called Ārya-deśa, and of a particularly sacred district called in Manu II. 17.
